Sterling gains on less dovish BoE tone

Yesterday's BoE policy announcement for August was a key highlight of the macro diary. As expected, the BoE cut rates by 25bps, to 4%. However, the overall market reaction to the meeting outcome indicated a less dovish tone emanating from the BoE. This was evident in a modest firming in market pricing for UK rate expectations. The timing of the next rate cut was pushed out to early 2026 rather than the end of this year. This backdrop provided some upward support to sterling.

In terms of specifics regarding the 'less dovish' BoE tone, this included the voting breakdown in favour of a rate cut being much closer than expected (5:4 vs. 7:2 f'cast). On top of this, the BoE's updated macro forecasts saw upward revisions to its inflation projections. The central bank also commented that the upside risks to the inflation outlook had "moved slightly higher" since its previous forecasting round in May. Meanwhile, in relation to its forward guidance, the changes to the text and Governor Bailey's comments suggest the BoE may be more patient around the timing of its next rate cut and the extent of further easing may be limited.

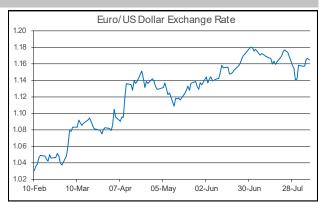

From a currency viewpoint, the combination of a firmer sterling and some euro weakness (no obvious driver of this) saw EUR/GBP unable to hold onto the 87p mark. The pair opens this morning at 86.7p. Sterling also made gains versus the dollar, with GBP/USD reclaiming ground up in $1.34 territory. Elsewhere, the softer euro was evident in EUR/USD edging back down to a low of $1.162. News that President Trump was nominating Stephen Miran to replace Fed Gov. Kugler did act as somewhat of a drag on the dollar. EUR/USD starts today near the midpoint of $1.16-1.17.

Today' macro diary is very quiet on both sides of the Atlantic. Therefore, the FX majors may be confined to relatively narrow ranges heading into the weekend.
