

ECB on hold and stresses data dependency

As had been widely anticipated, the ECB left monetary policy on hold yesterday. Furthermore, the meeting statement and press conference provided no specific guidance on the near-term path for interest rates. Indeed, the ECB noted that it is not “pre-committing to a particular rate path”, while President Lagarde stated that the next meeting in September “is wide open”.

Against this backdrop, the market reaction to the ECB policy decision was limited. Futures contracts pricing indicates that investors see a lower probability of a rate cut in September (65% chance vs. 90% before hand). However, a total of 45bps of policy easing is still priced in for year end. Elsewhere on markets, benchmark equity indices continued to move lower on both sides of the Atlantic, while bond yields were little changed.

Currency-wise, the main FX pairs operated in relatively narrow ranges. The ECB meeting did not impact the euro. Overall, of the muted action to note, the dollar was holding a slightly firmer tone, while the yen was on the defensive. In level terms, this sees USD/JPY up above the ¥157 threshold. EUR/USD is operating below the $1.09 handle. GBP/USD is changing hands in the $1.29-1.30 range. Meantime, EUR/GBP remains in and around the 84p mark.

Already this morning, UK retail sales have printed below the consensus, contracting by 1.2% in June (vs. -0.6% f'cast). However, the data have not impacted sterling in early trading. Meantime, UK consumer confidence also came in below expectations in July, rising to -13 from -14 (vs. -12 f'cast). The remainder of today's data calendar is quite sparse. However, remarks from a number of Fed speakers will warrant attention.
