

Euro marginally softer

It was another quiet day in terms of macro newsflow yesterday. The Eurozone and UK data diaries offered no releases of any note. In the US, the main data highlight was housing starts for July. The headline number provided an upside surprise relative to expectations. However, given the lower tier nature of the data, it was not surprising that it did not generate any market reaction. From an investor sentiment perspective, there was a mixed tone to proceedings. The Euro Stoxx 50 finished 0.9% higher on the day. The mood on Wall Street was more cautious. At the closing bell last night, the S&P 500 was down 0.6%.

On the currency front, as expected, the main pairs were confined to narrow ranges yesterday amid the dearth of market moving data releases. This muted action has generally persisted in overnight trading on Asia-Pacific markets.

As a result, most of the majors start this morning's European session showing only minimal changes over the past 24 hours. In level terms, the euro is marginally softer compared to yesterday's open. EUR/USD has edged down below the midpoint of $1.16-1.17, while EUR/GBP is operating nearer to the 86p threshold. Meantime, GBP/USD is just below the $1.35 handle. Elsewhere, the yen has made some gains on the exchanges.

Today's macro diary is more eventful. Indeed, already this morning we have had the 7am release of UK CPI inflation data for July. Headline and core inflation printed slightly higher than forecast. Both registered a reading of 3.8% (versus forecasts for 3.7%). This evening (after European close) we get the Fed meeting minutes for July. However, these minutes are somewhat 'dated' at this stage given the weak payroll data that were published since the meeting. Instead, the market's focus from a US monetary policy viewpoint will be on Fed Chair Powell's Jackson Hole speech on Friday.
