

ECB poses 2-way risk for euro

Over the past 24 hours both the euro and sterling have adopted a softer tone. The former has been on the defensive ahead of today's ECB meeting. The latter has edged lower following a ruling by a Scottish court that PM Johnson's move to prorogue Parliament was "unlawful". The UK government has stated that it will appeal the decision to the Supreme Court.

Overnight, President Trump announced a delay in the imposition of additional tariffs on China. However, currency market impact to the latest trade-related development has been limited.

All of the above is reflected in EUR/USD opening this morning down at the $1.10 threshold, while cable (GBP/USD) is back in the lower half of the $1.23-1.24 band. Meantime, EUR/GBP continues to operate below the midpoint of the 89-90p range.

Today, we get the August print of US CPI. Headline inflation is expected to hold below 2%, though core is forecast to have edged up to 2.3%. Such evidence of a build up in price pressures could see the dollar move higher. There is little out to influence sterling.

The highlight, though, is the ECB's policy meeting. The consensus is that the central bank will cut the depo rate by 10bps to -0.5%. It may also introduce a tiered deposit facility to negate the impact on banks of negative rates. The ECB could also guide that it may cut rates further and make an announcement regarding QE.

The meeting poses some two-way risk to the euro. If the central bank is seen to under-deliver (e.g. no QE announcement or less dovish rate guidance), the currency could move higher. At the same time, a rate cut in excess of 10bps or the announcement of a sizeable QE programme could see the euro lose ground.
