

EUR/USD clings to $1.07

As expected, the ECB left monetary policy unchanged yesterday. However, the meeting statement noted that if the ECB's updated assessment of the inflation outlook (due in June) gives it further confidence that underlying inflation is converging to its 2% target, it would be "appropriate to reduce the current level of monetary policy restrictions". President Lagarde stated though, that the ECB is not "pre-committing to a particular rate path".

However, the impact from the ECB meeting on market rate expectations was somewhat muted. Indeed, remarks from BoE official Greene yesterday have had a greater impact on futures pricing. Greene stated that in her view, UK rate cuts were still "a way off". Meantime, in the US, a number of officials, including Williams, Collins and Barkin, have struck hawkish chords in speeches over the past 24 hours. Against this backdrop, current futures pricing is for rate cuts in the region of 75-80bps in the Eurozone, and circa 45-50bps in the US and UK, by year end.

On the currency front, the euro has been under some modest downward pressure. The softer tone to the euro is evidenced by EUR/USD opening this morning back at the $1.07 threshold. GBP/USD continues to operate in the $1.25-1.26 band. Elsewhere, EUR/GBP is in the lower half of 85-86p. USD/JPY remains above ¥153.

Already today, the monthly reading of UK GDP for February has printed at +0.1%, in-line with expectations. Meanwhile, industrial output rose by 1.1% in February, well above the consensus for stagnation. However, the release has not impacted sterling so far in early trading. Later today, the main highlight will be the preliminary reading of US consumer sentiment for April. Barring any major surprises though, the data are unlikely to effect the dollar.
