BoE meeting poses event risk for sterling

Monetary policy meetings have dominated the macro agenda over the past 24 hours. Investors started yesterday morning digesting the overnight news that the BoJ had, as expected, hiked rates, as well as trimming its bond purchases. Against the backdrop of the BoJ actually matching hawkish expectations/speculation, the yen gained around 2%. USD/JPY traded below the ¥150 threshold.

Meanwhile, yesterday evening's Fed meeting concluded with rates left on hold, in a 5.25-5.50% range, in line with expectations. The statement did not contain any significant changes. However, in the press conference, Chair Powell did state that a rate cut "could be on the table as soon as the next meeting in September". The market was already fully pricing in a 25bps cut next month.

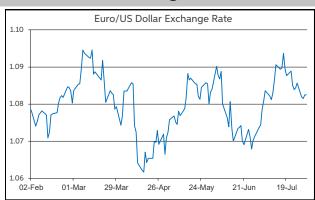

Therefore, from a currency viewpoint, there was no notable or lasting impact on the dollar. This is reflected in some of the main dollar pairs trading this morning very similar to yesterday's opening levels. EUR/USD remains in the lower half of $1.08-1.09, while GBP/USD is near to the midpoint of $1.28-1.29. Elsewhere, EUR/GBP continues to changes hands within a tight 84.1p-84.5p range.

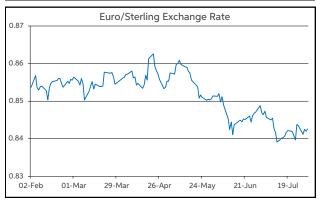

The focus today shifts to the BoE rate decision. The meeting also includes its latest Monetary Policy Report and press conference. The decision to leave rates unchanged in June was "finely balanced" for some members. However, since then, there has been very little insight from BoE speakers. The market had been very much 50:50 as to whether the BoE would cut rates today. In the last few days though, the futures market has been leaning towards a rate cut (attaching around a 60% probability to such an outcome). Overall, today's BoE policy decision is a close call. Therefore, given this uncertainty, there is some two-way risk for sterling.
