

Important data due this week

A feature of the action amongst the FX majors last week was the firmer tone to sterling in the aftermath of the BoE meeting. Despite cutting rates by 25bps to 4.00% (as expected), the pound made gains on the exchanges amid the less dovish BoE tone and the resulting modest firming in rate expectations. At the same time, the dollar remained on the defensive. Last week's US macro diary was quiet, but the main release of note (non-manu ISM) missed to the downside of expectations, keeping the greenback under pressure.

In level terms, all of the above was evident in GBP/USD trading up into the top half of $1.34-1.35. The firmer sterling tone also meant the EUR/GBP pair was unable to maintain the 87p threshold. Meanwhile, EUR/USD was on a general uptrend, trading to a peak of $1.1698, before settling near to the midpoint of $1.16-1.17

This week contains some important data from both a dollar and sterling perspective. For the dollar, July CPI inflation will receive a lot of attention. Investors and the Fed will be looking to see if there are further signs of tariff related upward pressure on prices. This data will form an important input into the Fed's decision on whether to keep rates on hold or cut in September. Retail sales and industrial production (both July) are also notable US releases due this week.

For sterling, the first estimate of Q2 GDP is expected to confirm that the economy lost momentum in the quarter, after tariff related front loading boosted growth in Q1. The UK diary also features a raft of labour market updates for Q2 (unemployment, employment, wage growth) as well as payroll data for July. Year-to-date, the data have been indicating a softening in labour market conditions and this trend is likely to continue to be reflected in the latest numbers. From a euro perspective, the macro schedule over the coming days is sparse. Employment data for Q2 and the second estimate of GDP for the quarter are the only releases of note.
