

Central Bank event risk today

There was somewhat of a mixed tone to proceedings on financial markets yesterday. The Euro Stoxx 50 finished broadly flat. However, on Wall Street last night, the S&P 500 index was up nearly 1% on the day.

Data-wise, the main release of note from a sparse calendar yesterday was the flash reading of Eurozone inflation. The headline rate rose unexpectedly to a new record high of 5.1%, from 5% and versus expectations for a 4.4% rate. The release did coincide with some modest upward support for the euro.

Overall though, the main currency pairs have been confined to relatively tight ranges. The dollar has remained under some mild downward pressure. EUR/USD spent some time yesterday above $1.13. It opens this morning just below this threshold. The GBP/USD pair is trading at the halfway point of $1.35-1.36. Meanwhile, EUR/GBP has continued to change hands in a tight range in and around the midpoint of the 83-84p band.

Today, the central bank diary is very much front and centre of market attention and therefore provides some event risk for currency markets. The BoE is expected to hike rates by 25bps to 0.5%. Given that this is priced in by markets, any impact on sterling may stem from what guidance the BoE offers on further rate hikes this year as well as their updated macro forecasts.

Meantime, the ECB is not anticipated to make any policy changes and continue to guide that rate hikes are unlikely this year. However, with the market now pricing in around 20bps of tightening by year end, President Lagarde will face plenty of questions on the Eurozone rate outlook at the press conference.
