

Yen weaker following BoJ meeting

There was a mixed tone to investor sentiment yesterday. In Europe, the Euro Stoxx 50 gained 0.4% on the day. Meanwhile, Wall Street returned from its long weekend in a more subdued mood. At the closing bell last night, the S&P 500 was 0.2% lower from where it started the day. On bond markets, yields were generally lower, although the magnitude of falls differed across geographies. The 10-year German bund yield fell by 11bps to below the 2.1% mark.

Meantime, on the currency front, sterling managed to adopt a firmer tone, which was reflected in gains being registered against both the dollar and the euro. Relative moves in market swap rates were favourable to sterling yesterday. In level terms, the firmer tone to sterling saw the EUR/GBP pair trade down below the 88p mark. Meanwhile, GBP/USD moved up into $1.23 territory. Elsewhere, EUR/USD spent much of yesterday in a fairly tight range in and around the $1.08 handle.

In overnight news, the Bank of Japan's first policy meeting of the year saw the central bank leave its policy rate and 10-year Japanese Bond yield target rate unchanged. Unlike in December, there was no change to its yield curve band. The lack of action or signals that policy changes were on the cards disappointed market expectations. As a result, the yen came under downward pressure, with USD/JPY moving back up above the ¥130 level.

UK CPI data released just a short while ago saw inflation in December edge back to 10.5% (from 10.7%), which was in line with consensus forecasts. Later this afternoon, there is a busy US macro diary, which includes retail sales and industrial production updates for December.
