

ECB signals rate hikes on the way but euro weakens

Yesterday's key event, the ECB policy meeting, saw the central bank announce that a 25bps rate hike is on the cards at its next meeting on July 21st. It also provided guidance that it would continue to hike rates in September. In this regard, it did not rule out a 50bps rate increase at this meeting. Futures contracts have 75bps of hikes priced in for Q3, which includes a 50bps rise in September. Meanwhile, there was a hardening of rate hike expectations in Q4, with rates now seen getting to near 1%.

From a currency viewpoint, the euro experienced some volatility during the ECB's post meeting press conference. It initially moved higher. However, despite the hawkish message from the Governing Council, these moves were not sustained. In level terms, the EUR/USD pair briefly rose from the $1.07 mark, to a high of $1.077 before falling below $1.07. Similarly, EUR/GBP rose to a high of 85.9p before declining and settling in and around the 85p threshold.

Overall, the euro is holding a weaker tone over the past 24 hours. EUR/USD opens this morning in the lower half of $1.06-1.07. Meantime, EUR/GBP is straddling the 85p handle. Elsewhere, the action in GBP/USD has been less eventful, although the pair has edged lower with the dollar supported by the risk averse tone on markets. It starts today below the $1.25 threshold.

Looking ahead to today, the key data highlight will be US CPI inflation figures for May. There are hopes that US inflation may have or be close to its peak after slowing slightly in April. The consensus is for the headline CPI rate to remain unchanged at 8.3% in May. Meanwhile, US consumer sentiment in June is forecast to weaken further.
