

Risk averse mood supports the dollar

The risk averse mood evident on markets last week carried over into the start of this week. Indeed, it gathered further momentum yesterday as investors are increasingly concerned about the impact that aggressive monetary policy tightening will have on the economic outlook. These concerns were reflected in the US yield curve inverting briefly, with the 2-year Treasury yield rose above the 10-year yield. This is seen by markets as a harbinger of a potential recession in the US economy.

In terms of market rate expectations, futures contracts now see US official rates rising near to 4% by the end of 2023, the UK Bank Rate peaking close to 3.5% next year and Eurozone rates rising near to 2.4% over the course of 2023.

The 'risk off' mood was very much in evidence on equity markets. On Wall Street, the global benchmark S&P 500 index entered bear market territory (falling by more than 20% from its most recent high). At the closing bell last night, the index was down 3.9% on the day, 22% below its early January peak.

Currency-wise, the dollar remained to the fore amid the risk averse backdrop and the resultant safe haven demand. The EUR/USD rate was testing down near its key support of $1.04. Meanwhile, GBP/USD fell below the $1.22 threshold. Elsewhere, EUR/GBP continued to trade within 85-86p, edging slightly higher within this range.

Looking ahead to today, general market sentiment may remain the main driver of any moves on the currency front. Markets are likely to remain focused on the interest rate outlook with the Fed (Wed) and BoE (Thurs) meetings looming large.
