

Sterling under pressure

Investor sentiment remained in a cautious mood yesterday. Although, the losses on equity markets were more modest in comparison to Monday. On fixed income markets, yields generally remained on an upward trajectory yesterday, as bond investors continued to contemplate an aggressive pace of rate hikes over the remainder of this year. The 10-year US Treasury yield rose by over 10bps to 3.48%. It was notable though that UK gilt yields and swap rates did not rise to the same extent as elsewhere.

On the currency front, sterling found itself under downward pressure. This was in part, attributable to the aforementioned interest rate differentials. This in turn, was related to softer than expected UK labour market data which highlighted concerns over the challenging outlook for the UK economy. EU-UK trade tensions were also unhelpful to the currency. In level terms, the softer tone to sterling is reflected in EUR/GBP moving up to 87p. Meanwhile, GBP/USD has fallen down towards the $1.20 threshold. Elsewhere, the EUR/USD pair has edged higher within the $1.04-1.05 range.

Ahead today, data-wise, we get US retail sales for May. However, attention will centre on the US Fed meeting (concludes after European close). There has been increasing speculation that the Fed will hike by 75bps today, rather than the previously assumed 50bps. Another 75bps hike is priced in for July. Therefore, its updated interest rate projections will garner close attention.

Overall, both the dollar and indeed general market sentiment could be sensitive to today's Fed outcome. Before then, in breaking news this morning, it has been announced that the ECB has called an unexpected meeting to discuss current market conditions.
