

Sterling settles higher post-BoE

It was another volatile day on financial markets yesterday, with monetary policy remaining firmly in focus. The Euro Stoxx 50 and the S&P 500 both finished down by 3-3.5% over growing concerns that aggressive policy tightening may cause a recession. On bond markets, 10yr yields in the Eurozone rose by circa 3-12bps. Crucially though, 10yr Italian BTP yields continued to decline.

Meanwhile, the Bank of England hiked rates by 25bps as expected, bringing the Bank rate up to 1.25%. In an update to its forward guidance, the BoE appears to have turned more hawkish on the rates outlook. Elsewhere, in a surprise move, the Swiss National Bank, unexpectedly raised rates by 50bps. Overnight, the Bank of Japan announced no immediate changes to policy as anticipated, and remained dovish on the future path of interest rates.

Amid the hawkish shifts in monetary policy, trading conditions remained choppy on currency markets. Sterling initially moved lower following the BoE's decision, but finished the day on the front-foot. Meantime, the Swiss franc surged by circa 2%. Elsewhere, the dollar was under some slight downward pressure.

In level terms, the firmer tone to sterling sees EUR/GBP open down below the 86p mark. GBP/USD is operating above the midpoint of $1.22-1.23. The softer tone to the dollar is evidenced by EUR/USD changing hands up at the $1.05 handle.

Turning to the day ahead, the main releases of note are the final reading of Eurozone HICP inflation for May, and US industrial production (also for May). However, neither release is likely to impact on currency markets. Instead, any directional moves for the FX majors may be driven by general market sentiment.
