

Softer dollar tone

There was a risk averse tone to investor sentiment yesterday. This occurred against the backdrop of on-going concerns over stretched AI stock valuations as well as uncertainty over Fed interest rate policy (i.e. whether they will cut in December or go on hold).

The 'risk off' tone was evident in falls on the main equity indices on both sides of the Atlantic. In Europe, the Euro Stoxx fell by 0.8%. Meanwhile, at the closing bell on Wall Street last night, the S&P 500 was 1.7% lower on the day. The downbeat mood has continued in overnight trading, with the Nikkei falling by 1.8%.

From a currency perspective, the dollar found itself on the defensive yesterday amid the risk averse mood. In normal times, the dollar tends to benefit from its safe haven appeal. However, given that many of the current concerns/sources of uncertainty are US centric, the dollar has faced a more challenging backdrop. At the same time, the euro has, more recently, tended to benefit against the dollar and sterling when markets have become more nervous.

In level terms, the softer dollar tone and firmer euro over the past 24 hours is reflected in EUR/USD opening this morning above the $1.16 threshold. The GBP/USD pair is trading up at the midpoint of $1.31-1.32. Meanwhile, USD/JPY has edged back to the halfway point of the ¥154-155 band.

Elsewhere, on the currency front, the combination of the slightly firmer euro and modestly weaker sterling has seen EUR/GBP consolidate its position up in 88p territory. The pair starts this morning's European session at 88.5p.

Looking ahead to today, the main release of note, from a quiet data calendar, is the second estimate of Eurozone GDP for Q3. A modest 0.2% growth rate is pencilled in for the quarter.
