

Dollar softens ahead of Thanksgiving

A busy US data schedule and month-end flows impacted financial markets throughout yesterday. Equity markets moved slightly lower on both sides of the Atlantic, with the Euro Stoxx 50 declining by 0.6%, while the S&P 500 fell by 0.4%.

Data-wise, the main release of note was US core-PCE inflation for October. As expected, it rose to 2.8% from 2.7%. Elsewhere, personal income printed above the consensus, rising by 0.6% m/m in October (vs. +0.4% f'cast). Personal consumption also rose by more than anticipated, increasing by 0.4% m/m (vs. +0.3% f'cast).

The data sparked some volatility for the dollar. Overall, the greenback was on the defensive. However, there was no obvious catalyst for the move, which suggests month-end flows ahead of the Thanksgiving holiday may have impacted the dollar. The US currency shed circa 0.5-0.7% against the euro, sterling and yen.

From a euro perspective, the single currency was boosted by some hawkish remarks from ECB official Schnabel. However, the single currency handed back its gains amid concerns over ongoing Budget negotiations in France and disappointing German consumer confidence data for November.

As trading gets underway this morning, the weaker dollar tone is evidenced by EUR/USD opening up at the midpoint of $1.05-1.06. GBP/USD is changing hands in the top half of $1.26-1.27. Meantime, EUR/GBP remains in the bottom half of 83-84p.

Today, a busy data calendar in the Eurozone includes the EC sentiment indices and German flash HICP inflation (both Nov).
